ACS UK has appointed Stavros Themistocli as its new Programmes Director, marking his return to the aircraft interiors company following nearly three years at Raytheon UK.

Themistocli previously spent more than a decade with ACS UK, progressing from Programme Manager to Head of Programmes before moving into the defense sector.

During his time at Raytheon UK, he oversaw program management activities for a major U.K. defense training initiative, helping establish and lead a new team.

He returns with expanded experience in program governance, commercial management, customer collaboration and cross-functional leadership.

In his new role, Themistocli will focus on strengthening program governance, improving collaboration across departments and enhancing delivery performance as ACS UK continues to develop its aircraft interiors solutions.

"The cabin interiors market continues to evolve, and customers are looking for partners who can bring not just great products and engineering expertise, but also confidence in delivery," Themistocli said in the company's announcement.

The appointment supports ACS UK's continued investment in its people, operations and future development, with a focus on improving program execution and customer support.

"We are delighted to welcome Stavros back to ACS UK," said Nigel McSorley, Chief Executive Officer, ACS UK.

"His deep understanding of the business, combined with the wider leadership experience he has gained in recent years, makes him ideally placed to lead our Programmes function."
