easyJet’s charity Northern Lights flight raises funds for Aerobility

The flight will be the first Northern Lights experience the airline and charity have operated since before the pandemic began easyJet and charity Aerobility announced a partnership offering a flight to experience the Northern Lights at 30,000 feet, according to a recent release.

Tickets for the flight from Gatwick on February 18, 2023, include a two-course meal at the Gatwick Sofitel Hotel entertainment and expert presentations from BBC’s Sky at Night presenter Pete Lawrence and Aurora experts from the British Antarctic Survey. The funds raised will go to Aerobility, a charity with the mission to provide anyone with any disability with access to flying.

Mike Miller Smith, CEO of Aerobility, said: “We exist to change lives by providing anyone, with any disability, access to the magic and wonder of flight. We do this because taking the controls of an aircraft drives a focus on capability and encourages our flyers to ask the question ‘If I can fly an airplane, what else can I do?’”

The flight will be the first Northern Lights experience the airline and charity have operated since before the pandemic began, according to the release. Tickets are now available to book at Aerobility.com/aurora for £349 per person, with discounted rates available for disabled flyers, carers and children.
